

View of the large boulders in the center of Roxaboxen Park. Roxaboxen "looked like any rocky hill - nothing but sand and rocks"

A "thorny ocotillo" in the park today. The children played with swords of ocotillo and sucked the honey from its flowers when it blossomed.

Rocks left by children today are reminiscent of the rock houses made by children in the story.

This map in Roxaboxen Park encourages visitors to leave a rock from their home state.

This sign welcomes visitors to Roxaboxen Park in Yuma, Arizona.

Some benches were in the park. This collage of tiles was created by Yuma school children around one of the benches.
